

Suicide Blonde and other stories

Love and death. Eros and thanatos. All the best stories are about one or the other, or both at once. In this collection of short fiction, writer Katherine Tomlinson considers the topics across multiple genres and in various styles from the pulp sensibilities of the title story to the high fantasy of The Ugly One. The Temperature at Which Love Freezes The front door shut with a soft but emphatic click as Jonathan slipped out of the house. Even though he knew Kaye wouldn't have heard it she slept like a hibernating bear he still found himself looking over his shoulder to make sure she hadn't wakened, that she wasn't following him with her dead brown eyes. But Kaye had merely grunted and turned over, burrowing deeper into the 600-thread count sheets and goose-down comforter. There was only one person who would send Jonathan a text in the middle of the night; only one person whose text he would read in the middle of the night. When the phone had buzzed, Jonathan had grabbed for it, fumbled for his glasses on the bedside table and read the message without turning on the light. Come outside. I have a surprise for you. Lila had attached his favorite picture of her, the one he'd taken after surprising her in the shower. With barely a glance at his sleeping wife, Jonathan had slid out from beneath the covers, squeezed his bare feet into the fleece-lined slippers Kaye had ordered online without checking his size, and padded silently across the carpeted floor. He'd tied his plaid bath robe tightly before venturing out into the cold, well aware that all he had on underneath the flannel was a pair of thin cotton boxer shorts. Outside, Jonathan breathed deeply. Purged of the vague day-time petroleum scent that always lingered in the wake of rush-hour commuters using his street as a short-cut to the freeway, the night smelled like pine needles. There was an icy mist in the air that threatened to turn to sleet but the chill felt good against his warm skin, over-heated by the furnace bulk of his wife lying next to him on a bed that had been too small to share for at least a year.

Katherine Tomlinson once again enthralls with a collection of tales beamed directly from the darkest edges of the human psyche, a place where you may just find yourself rooting for the murderer, and hardly anything is what it seems. These endings may not always be happy, but in some skewed way, they almost always feel right. Christine Pope, author of Dragon Rose and Bad Vibrations.
