

Women and the Alphabet: A Series of Essays

Paris smiled, for an hour or two, in the year 1801, when, amidst Napoleons mighty projects for remodelling the religion and government of his empire, the ironical satirist, Sylvain Marechal, thrust in his Plan for a Law prohibiting the Alphabet to Women. Daring, keen, sarcastic, learned, the little tract retains to-day so much of its pungency, that we can hardly wonder at the honest simplicity of the authors friend and biographer, Madame Gacon Dufour, who declared that he must be insane, and soberly replied to him.
